The Journal of Charles Rawn
May 25 to July 26, 1833 (Book 4)
Edited by Neil H. Leifert

Introduction

This pocket-sized volume is the smallest of all the books. Rawn wrote that he had intended to copy it into the larger Book 4, but finally he was not inclined to do so. He probably needed a more compact journal because, over the two months I was able to track, he and his new wife, Frances, traveled extensively throughout the central and eastern Pennsylvania countryside, and included visits to Lancaster, Marietta, Philadelphia, West Chester, and Lebanon, among other stops.

The journal begins on Charles Rawn's wedding day, May 25, 1833. It is an entry devoid of romance that simply enumerates the events of the day and is not unlike every subsequent entry over the next sixty days. In fact, I was struck by how consistently matter-of-fact his style was, punctuated with only a few exceptions, such as his chance encounter with President Andrew Jackson in Philadelphia during the week of June 8th, and in a later entry, commenting that a particular art exhibit was not proper for mixed company.

The impressive number of people who passed through Charles Rawn's life included a rich mélange of friends, acquaintances, business associates, clients, and a few unnamed service people, such as deliverymen, hackmen (carriage drivers), and the like. Mentioned frequently throughout were the Peacocks, the Clendennins (his spelling of his wife's family), and the Shunks, among others. Charles Rawn was also an avid letter writer, communicating with many persons, most of whom were more or less ancillary to his professional life.
