The Journal of Charles Rawn
July 10 to October 14, 1842 (Book 13)

Edited by Emily Howley

Introduction

This section of Rawn's journal is approximately three months long. For most of the month of July the courts did not meet, so Rawn's law practice was relatively slow. Once the courts commenced in August, however, Rawn was very busy with cases, correspondence, and meetings. He kept the journal as a record of his law practice and financial accounting, as was recommended by his teacher and mentor, Mr. Shunk. When Rawn did discuss his family or a personal matter it was usually in relation to a household expense or a major event such as a death, birth, or baptism. Interestingly, Rawn mentioned his walks and rides as meticulously as he recorded his accounts.

Rawn wrote of hundreds of people in the three months examined. They can be broken into three groups: his family, those involved in his law practice, and those who worked for him as servants or hired-hands. His family was mentioned almost everyday by giving his wife some money, going for a walk with his son, or paying for the marketing that his mother-in-law buys. Although it may seem as if Rawn was almost cold in the way that he talked about his family, it is important to note that they were mentioned more than any other group in the journal. He talked about his wife thirty-eight times and his son, Charles thirty-two times while Alexander Ramsey, Esq., a colleague in Harrisburg, was mentioned only four times. He did not use his wife's first name and only made brief references to her but she did rank the highest in number of times that Rawn wrote about any one person. Clearly, Rawn was thinking of his wife enough to make her the prominent person in the journal even if he did not expound upon her.

Two African American men were mentioned in this section of the journal. In both cases, Rawn wrote their name followed by “col<sup>d</sup> man.” The first was Richard Mason, who went to Rawn for legal and financial advice. Mason had fifty-six dollars in “Relief Notes” which he wanted to exchange for silver. Rawn told him that this would be impossible so Mason left in the hopes of using the notes for a plot of land in Highspire. One wonders if Mason’s money was not exchangeable because of his race or because of its illegitimacy. The second reference was to Faynton Brown, who was hired by Rawn to break up a load of coal and put it away in Rawn’s house and shed. Although Rawn’s relationship to Mason is unclear, Brown’s role in the journal was clearly one of service to Charles Rawn. Besides these two men, the diarist never mentioned other people’s race or nationality. To Rawn, Mason and Brown stood out as men of a different race and also as men of a different class standing.

The Rawn family employed several people to help run their household. Martin Ostter is mentioned frequently as a hired-hand. Rawn paid Ostter at least once a week for jobs which are rarely described. Perhaps Ostter was hired to do work around the house and office as Rawn needed it. Also, Matty (last name unknown) did washing for the family from time to time.

The Rawn family also bought food from various people such as Mrs. Milleisen, Neuer, Mrs. Hoffman, Philip Smith, Matthias Schiffler, and Samuel Rassing. It is interesting to look at the relationship of the Rawns to Mrs. Milleisen. For two months,

Mrs. Milleisen sold them two pounds of butter for twenty-five to thirty cents. On September 3, Rawn noted that he paid 37 ½ cents for two pounds of butter and a week later he paid forty cents for the family's butter. Apparently, this price increase was too much for Rawn to pay so the next week he bought his butter elsewhere for 18 ¾ per pound and thirty cents for two pounds. Mrs. Milleisen must have noticed the absence of the Rawn business because on September 17 the price of her butter had gone back down to 37 ½ cents for two pounds which Rawn agreed to pay.

Rawn's law practice dominates the journal. He is meticulous about noting how much he receives, whom he visits, and who visits him. Once the courts were in session Rawn's days were very busy with letters, meetings, and trials. Because of Rawn's accounts it is fairly easy to follow his cases from day to day as they progress. When he refers to a case from an earlier date Rawn uses parentheses and refers the readers to either a Receipt book or another journal. These citations may appear as follows: (V.B.T. Rep<sup>t</sup> Book) or (v. 13 inst.).

On August 1, Rawn, his friend Charles Carson, Mary Scott Clendenin, and his son Charles took a trip to Middletown to look at lots of land. They stopped at General Cameron's home, where Mary and Charles wait outside until the men are done talking. We never learn about what happens during this meeting. Rawn keeps track of the cost of lemonade (10 cents), tolls (16 cents), and cakes for Charles (2 cents). A day away from the office did not mean a day away from the wallet in the eyes of Rawn. No penny went unnoticed.

Rawn did manage to get away from his finances during the Rolla incident. Apparently Rolla, the family dog, had been hurt and was spreading fleas throughout the house so Rawn asked Martin Ostter to take him out and shoot him. Rawn wrote, “He got badly hurt some month since which had almost entirely disabled him – he was full of fleas which he would leave about the doors till the house is fairly beset by them. Poor Dog! It was with great reluctance I could bring myself to consent to his death. We have had him 8 or 9 Years.” (August 31). In the three months examined, Rawn never exhibited as much emotion as he did when Rolla died. This is the only instance in which Rawn used an exclamation mark. It must have been a very tragic moment for Rawn and his family. But, in typical Rawn fashion, the next day Rawn, Charles, and Martin Ostter bury Rolla and Rawn notes that he pays Martin twenty-five cents for his help (September 1).

Rawn dealt with several cases during this period. One of the most interesting was that of Jacob Zearfass, who was arrested for operating a “Disorderly House.” Rawn does not define it for the reader; perhaps it was a house of prostitution or a loud, rowdy bar. Zearfass approached Rawn and his colleague, Alexander Ramsey, and asked them to defend him in the trial for $10 each with a $5 bonus if they won the case. Ramsey and Rawn did win the Zearfass case and asked the court to pay the costs of the trial and clear the “Disorderly House” charge from his name. Also, Zearfass was permitted to keep his tavern license.

Rawn suffered from an unknown illness throughout this time. Dr. Sharpless of Philadelphia prescribed several treatments including “Blue Pills,” and an inhaler with zinc, hemlock, and iodine. Rawn did not complain of any sickness and only discussed the prescriptions, his doctors, and the cost of the medicine. Rawn frequently wrote to Dr. Sharpless asking for advice and paying him for his services.

Another pattern in the journal is Rawn's church attendance. Of the fourteen Sundays in the three month sample, Rawn only attended church eight times. On two of those eight Sundays he left the service early because they did not have heat in the building. Rawn's church attendance was very regular in July and half of August but then it became sporadic. He only attended once in September and the two times he left early are in October. This pattern seems to correlate with his increased work load. When the courts are not meeting, Rawn's church attendance is high but when his case load increases, he chooses to stay home. Rawn did not say that he chose to use his Sundays for work but rather his Saturdays became a day of work, making Sunday the day of rest. Rawn shifted his schedule around from the usual work ethic which states that a person should work five days, rest one day (Saturday), and pray on Sunday. Rawn chose to work six days and rest on Sunday. Unfortunately, we never really know why Rawn chose to stay home because reasons for his actions are very seldom included in the journal.

Two charts have been created to examine Rawn's expenses and the people that he mentions. Over the three months, Rawn spends about $434.96 (See Appendix B). When the time period is split into three thirty day periods one can see how his spending pattern decreases as the summer turns to fall.

July 11- August 11	$198.52
August 12 – September 12	$151.78
September 13 – October 14	$84.66

Rawn's expenditures dropped dramatically over this three month period. One reason for this could be that he stopped buying ice around September 26, which he celebrated by saying "Last day of getting, Ice, Ice, Ice, Ice, Ice."

The second chart of people mentioned in Rawn's journal indicates that of the 193 people mentioned, only 24 were women, which indicates that Rawn's world was very male-oriented. The men in his journal vary from servants to statesmen, yet the women are either a part of the family, friends, or they sell food to the family. In other words, they existed within the domestic sphere. In this respect Rawn's journal is good at showing how different men and women's roles were and how little they mixed in the workplace. Although Mrs. Milleisen and Mrs. Hoffman sold dairy products to the Rawn family, they certainly would not have been mentioned in an entry about a court date or a business meeting.

In transcribing the journal I have kept the text looking as the journal looks. I did not change any misspellings or grammatical errors that Rawn made. When some letters are written above others in the word (ex. Rep<sup>t</sup>) Rawn usually put two dots below the superscripted letter. Also, payments are usually underlined twice. Unfortunately, computer limitations prevented me from being able to reproduce this aspect of the journal.
